NOTES OF THE GAME.

Boston today for a four-game series. The absence of Old Soi affected the attendance in spite of the fact that yesterday was may day in many of the government departments. Having captured the first series, here's hoping the Nationals keep up their good work. Brown, who did the flinging for the Yankees, is no midget. He registers six feet one inch and looks every bit of it.

Milan ran about a hundred yards in an attempt to catch Cree's triple in the third, but he barely got his fingers on the ball. Gallia used his slow ball effectively, mixing it up with his speady spitter. Sam Woods established the record of having caught the first foul fly from a seat in the upper grand stand, pabling one with one hand off Moeller's bat, in the fourth.

Judging by the interest exhibited in the Boston-Philadelphia score, Washington fans figure these two teams as the most strenuous of the Nationals' rivals for the flag.

Danny Moeller's snakelike grounder, which was juggled by Poone in the sixth iming, fractured the existing tie and helped put over the much-needed tally giving the Nationals the bulky lend of a 2 to 2 score yesterday over Bill Donovan's New Yorks.

The victory was particularly gratifying

The victory was particularly gratifying to Old Fox Griff and the local fans, for the reason that it brought to light Bert Gallia as a winning hurler prospect. Gailia worked the entire game, allowed with a shut-out. His own poor fielding payed the way for both New York runs. Opposed to Gallia was Carroll Brown once a member of the Athletics.
